VII. Comb The adverb Well is extensively employed in combination with various parts of the verb, esp. the past and present participles, and in parasynthetic adjectives ending in -ed. In modern practice the latter are regularly hyphened. In attributive use the participial formations are properly hyphened, and the hyphen is also frequently employed even when the construction is predicative. On account of the large number of such combinations, all those of any standing (either by common or continued use, or in virtue of their source) are treated as main words, the less important or less common being printed in smaller type without definition, after the model of similar words in UN-. The normal insertion or omission of the hyphen, according to the construction of the word in the sentence, is indicated by printing it within parentheses, as well(-)shaked.

In the following enumeration of the different types of combinations the illustration is chronological, and partly includes words more fully exemplified below.

The original forms of the pa. t. and pa. pple. are respectively wende and wended, went, but the forms wente, went appear beside these from c 1200, and latterly become the more usual; in the refl. and intr. senses went finally replaced the older preterites belonging to go, and from c 1500 is most naturally regarded as the pa. t. of that verb, while wend was provided with the new form wended.

The following are illustrations of the less usual forms of the infinitive and present. The ð-forms represent a normal lengthening of the vowel in certain dialects. The y-forms are merely graphic (by confusion with WIND *v.*1), as the rhymes regularly indicate wind or wënd. The ð-form is due to the influence of the pa. t. and pa. pple. in the form went(e.

Were- (wɪə). The first element of Werewolf used in combination, chiefly with names of animals, to indicate a human being imagined to be transformed into a beast; as were-animal, -ass, -bear, etc.; also were-man. Cf. Wer-.

1873 Lonsd. Wapiddi Inn iii. Introl. v. 4 The were-wolf is a legend old, But the were-ass is something new. 1883 J. F. M'Lennan in *Encycl. [OE. and Du. werewolf, MHG. werwolf (G. were-, wehrwolf), ICel. verúlfr; also WFris. waerdl, war ale (and waerwolf after Du.), Da. and Norw. varulv, Sw. varulf. The latter may represent an ON. varulf-r*, whence ONF. garwald (Marie de France, c 1175), later guaroul, -ou, garoul, -ou, warou, -en (mod.F. loup-garou); ON. vargulf-r (by association with varg-r wolf) occurs only in the translation of Marie's lay of Bisclavret.

The first element is prob. to be identified with OE. wer man Were *sb.*1, but the form were- in place of were- (cf. however were- and weregild Were-gild), and the variants in wer-, warwolf, -wolf, seem shrouded in doubt.

Evidence for the real currency of the word (chiefly in the B and γ forms) is rare, and confined to Sc. after the 17th cent. In modern use it has been revived through folk-lore studies, and until recently the usual form has been werewolf, and occas. wehrwolf (from German.)

1. A person who (according to mediæval superstition) was transformed or was capable of transforming himself at times into a wolf; † also, an exceptionally large and ferocious wolf.

The primitive Germanic stem west-t-* appears to be an extension of the west-* found in Gr. ἕσπερος, ἑσπέρα, L. vesper, vespera evening, west. In HG. dialects abend is similarly used for 'west'.

In OE. west occurs only as an adv., the use as noun and adj. being a later development. In the cognate languages it is usually (in some exclusively) a noun in the earlier period, the adverbial use coming later, and the adjectival being represented only by the first element in compounds (OE. west-in-west-dêl, etc.).

The fact that the Romanic forms for 'east' (F. est, etc.) have been adopted from English indicates that this, rather than any other Germanic language, is also the source of F. ouest (OF. west), Sp. and Pg. oeste.]

Wh.

WH, a consonantal digraph, normally represents initial hw in words of OE. origin, as in hwæt what, hwistrian to whisper. In words of other origin, its occurrence may be due to analogy resting on the supposed phonetic appropriateness of the 'aspirate' sound, as in whelp, whisk; it sometimes varies with h or simple w; e.g. whortleberry and hurtleberry, whoop and hoop, whetkeed and wetkeed. Historically OE. initial hw represents OTeut. xw (under which Indo-Eur. q^w and kw were levelled), which appears as hw in the early forms of the Germanic languages, but is variously modified in their modern forms, appearing in High and Low German as w, in the Scandinavian languages, according to dialect, as hv, kv, and v, in English as wh. For typical forms see WHAT.

The normal OE. spelling hw was generally preserved in early ME. till late in the 13th century, e. g. in the Nero MS. of Ancren Riwle (with occas. variants in w, as wase whoso), and the pieces contained in An Old English Miscellany (E. E. T. S.); it persists in the Ayenbite of Inwyt in the form hv, as hutch. The modern spelling wh is found first in regular use in the Ormulum, e. g. whille which; it is the commoner spelling in the earlier text of Layamon's Brut (with frequent variants in w), the Harl. MS. of King Horn, and the earliest MS. of Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle, and continues thence without interruption to the present day; sporadic anticipations occur in the 12th century in the Interlinear Rule of St. Benedict, as in miwhepera (ed. E. E. T. S., p. 81), whomne (ib. 103), and in the 12th century in the Peterborough Chronicle (e. g. while, an. 675), and the Lambeth and Cotton Homilies. A few instances of the omission of h occur in some early texts (e. g. sinuurful 'teres' in Epinal Gloss., wilum 'nunc' in 9th century Rule Glosses), and there are some in the 11th century Rule of St. Benedict (e. g. wyfre which, wanon whence); it becomes more frequent in the 12th century, chiefly in words of the interrogative class, e.g. wile, gewilcum, wat, wenne, and (sun)wile, for hwile, gewhilcum, hwæt, hwenne, and hwile (Cato Glosses, Canterbury Psalter, Peterborough Chronicle, Homilies, etc.). Many examples of simple w are to be found in the two versions of Layamon and other 13th century texts, and this variant spelling continues in widespread use till 1500.

Strong enunciation of the back (guttural) element in the pronunciation of (hw) is shown by the spellings chua, chuet, chwem, chuele = hwil, etc. of the Lindisfarne Gosp., and began to be denoted in ME. of the 13th century by the use of qu (quon, qw), first in East Anglian texts (once in the Destinry, quat whale; regularly but not exclusively in Genesis and Exodus). It remained a feature of East Anglian spelling till c 1450 (as in the Paston Letters and the works of John Metham), but after 1300 it became more especially a characteristic feature of northern English, surviving in Scottish, esp. in the form quh, till the 18th century. (For the converse use of wh for qu (kw), see the letter Q.)

Early in the 15th century appear spellings with wh of words with initial h followed by an o-sound. It occurs first before ǫ (= a), e.g. whom for hȳm (OE. hām) in Brut c 1420 (E. E. T. S.), pp. 346, 370, whalle for hȳle (OE. hall) in Chron. Vilod. c 1420, 3368, and Cantl. MS. of Guy of Warwick 3423, whole for hȳl (OE. hāl) in Partonope, whare for hāre hoar (OE. hār) in Revel. Monk of Evesham (1482); wholy for hōly is used by Tindale, 1526. Later, other words normally spelt with initial ho- (of whatever origin) became subject to the same variation of spelling; e. g. whore for hōre (OE. hōre), whole for hōle (OE. hol), whood for hood (OE. hōd), whoord for hōrd 'hoard' (OE. hord). Some of these spellings were especially frequent in the 16th century; thus whood 'hood' is used by Hall the chronicler, Nashe, Harvey, John Davies of Hereford, and Sylvester. The wh-spelling has become standardized in two of these words, viz. whole and whore, and their derivatives, in which it became common c 1600. The corresponding labialized pronunciation is current dialectally only in whole, but it survives in several other words where the standard form has preserved the original ho-, as in hoard, hold, hole, home, hot; in home, pronunciations such as (wom), (wuom), (wpm) cover a wide area. For details of the evidence see the various words in this Dict. and Eng. Dial. Dict.

Spellings of How adv. with initial hw, wh, and (consequently) quh are on a different footing, as they are due in the first place to association of the word with the interrogative why, where, etc.

From the fourteenth century onwards there are sporadic instances of initial wh for w, as whrighter (R. Brunne's Chron. Wace 8711), whrastid 'wrested' (St. Cuthbert, 6041), whrethehally (Hale, 1456). For the relationship of hwirlpool, hurlpool, hwhirlberry to whirlpool, whirlwind, whortleberry, etc., and of thwack, thwang to whack, whang, etc., see these words.

Pronunciation. In OE. the pronunciation symbolized by hw was probably in the earliest periods a voiced labial consonant preceded by a breath. This was developed in two different directions: (1) it was reduced to a simple voiced consonant (w); (2) by the influence of the accompanying breath, the voiced (w) became unvoiced. The first of these pronunciations (w) probably became current first in southern ME. under the influence of French spenkers, whence it spread northwards (but ME. orthography gives no reliable evidence on this point). It is now universal in English dialect speech except in the four northernmost counties and north Yorkshire, and is the prevailing pronunciation among educated speakers. The second pronunciation, denoted in this Dictionary by the conventional symbol (hw), and otherwise variously denoted by phoneticians, (wh), (ʍ), (ᵂ), (ʌ), is general in Scotland, Ireland, and America, and is used by a large proportion of educated speakers in England, either from social or educational tradition, or from a preference for what is considered a careful or correct pronunciation.

The 13th or 16th century Welsh transcript of the English Hymn to the Virgin (E.D.S. Misc. 3, p. 27) shows the voiceless pronunciation, rendering where by hwáer, and the evidence of the 16th century and later orthoepists goes to show that this was the prevailing pronunciation among cultured speakers, but there are indications that it was not of universal currency. Towards the end of the 18th century the voiced was unnoticed by the voiced sound, and the lexicographer John Walker (1791) notes that in London speech 'the aspirate h is often sunk', and includes the voiced pronunciation of wh among the four faults of the speech of the metropolis. The pronunciation of the voiceless labialized (hw) has become the voiceless labio-dental (f) in interrog. pronns. and advs., as fa who, fat what, fan when; in Aberdeen and Banff in other words also, as fite white, fulp whelp, fup ship. (Cf. Trans. of Philol. Soc. 1870–72, p. 570.)

The history of the group of words of which WHIM *sb.*1, WHIMSY, and this word are the chief members, is not clear. The evidence for HEXHAM of Anglus to wander with them as with the fugitive look of a frightened or silly person, and brisanus to be taken aback or discomfited, suggests the possibility of an Anglian Scandi origin ; but, seeing that whim-wham is the earliest recorded of the group(contemporaneously with the similar reduplicated forms mentioned above), and has no Scandi origin in sight, seeing that whim-wham is the earliest recorded of the group(contemporaneously with the similar reduplicated forms mentioned above), and has no symbolic origin is more likely ; in which case whimsy may be related to whim-wham as flimzy to flim-flam.]
